New Foreign Policy Study from Hoover Institution Press

The United States and the Republic of Korea Background for Policy
by Claude A. Buss

If hostilities between North Korea and South Korea again erupt, the chances are that under present circumstances, the Russians on one side and the Americans on the other would be involved immediately in another war on the mainland of China. This study answers the imperative to search out the roots of potential conflict by considering what the United States can and cannot do in seeking to protect its interests, and explores the international ramifications of the U.S.–ROK relationship.
